CREMATION.

In a prayer-book published in the reigns of William and Mary there is an illustration to our Lord's parable of the mote and the beam. From the eye of one man a huge log of wood is protruding, and in that of the other is a very fine cast of a hair. The latter is a very fine caricature of the portrait of a white bull on the part of the theologist is highly amusing.

In an engraving of the "Impotent Man, a Tree of Beltheden," an angelic messenger troubling the waters of a very diminutive pond with a long pole, and altogether the effect is most astounding. Pictures of this sort may be found in almost every book.

DARDISTAN AND THE DARDS.

The news Dr. Feltner brings of the people of Dardistan is of such interest, as showing the effects of the conquest of Afghanistan, that we might be made of much use to check upon the policy of the Maharajah of Kashmir and the turbulent character of the Afghans. That they are well able to do good work may be judged from the fact that they have maintained, for an indefinite series of years, a struggle for existence against all the surrounding tribes.

When the British Government extends to Kashmir, and the Sinder ridges, so liberally supplied to Shbr Ahi, which has endangered the existence of this brave and undaunted race. The Dards are generally slender, wiry, native men, well suited to mountain life. They are fairer than the people of the plains, and have blue eyes and decided European cast of countenance. The English indeed maintain that the English are brother Kafirs, and of the same race. The Kafirs are undoubtedly the best of the cluster—strong, intelligent, and honest—kill because they are killed, but never lower themselves by plundering. The Dards are the same, however, and are comparatively well armed. Chalisas are robbers by profession, and not long ago sent out as many as 10,000 able-bodied men into surrounding districts. They go long distances on their marauding excursions, and cross rivers on inflated buffalo and goat skins just in the manner shown in the ancient sculpture of Babylon. The people of Dardistan were well complimented on the elegance of their dress, emblem and explained that it was all lost—in being their practices to plunder.

quently, to the very market whence they were brought, none daring to witness them for fear of their wrath. In Chikiri kidnapping and selling slaves forms the chief source of revenue; a man selling, generally, for about twenty dollars, and a woman for about three men for a large piece of spotted cloth. The Kafir are superior to this temptation, using all their endeavours to save themselves and families from the slave-market. All the hill-men enjoy a Republican form of government, which strikingly resembles what we should call anarchy; but, as Dr. Iselin truly observes, "it is not anarchy, but a chaos." The Kafir, Kaahini, which threatens to supersede it, and which kills the intellectual and moral life of its people, reducing all to the same dead level of slavery, and extinguishing the spirit of freedom. Among so uncivilized a people as the Duris, arts and manufactures hold no high place; nevertheless, they make their own matchlocks, and

aws to lady re

ously with the boys and their great recreation is palo, or hockey on horseback. A marked difference between the Dards and strict Mahomedane is found in their partiality for beer brewed from corn, and for wine which consists of the juice of the grape allowed to ferment in the sun. The Dards do not have their way of procuring the alder bark custom of laying down plenty of it in their youth that they may enjoy a good bottle in their old age; but the Dards operate upon gaki, which they bury when a child is born, and which is distributed to the friends of the young man. The gaki, which by this time has become frightfully sour, is esteemed a delicacy. Another peculiarity which distinguishes the Dards from other Mahomedans is the absence of restraint in the meeting of the sexes, and the absence of all prudery without shyness, and there is nothing like the pardal to be found in the land. In Astor, however, raw milk must not be drunk with a woman, unless it is intended to make her a sister by the bond of friendship which is established by the act of coitus. When men drink raw milk together they swear eternal friendship—Oriate!
